Presentations without the pain: practical tips for effective academic presentations

Speaker

Jock McPherson, Ph.D.

Assistant Director at the Centre for International Training and Education, University of Leicester, specialises in English for Academic Purposes.

Academic presentations are an important means of disseminating research. However, compared with academic written genres such as journal articles, the expectations and 'rules' around presentations are relatively ill-defined. Despite these factors, students and staff often receive little or no training in how to give effective presentations. This talk will provide practical guidance and tips for the preparation and delivery of academic presentations. Attendees will leave better equipped to give presentations with a minimum of pain – for themselves, and more importantly for their audiences.
